Do you think you have a manga somewhere? Most of us are able to come up with a decent storyline. It's getting it on paper that takes some skill. Here are some tips to help you bring out your next bestseller. You can't develop your story until you know where it should go. What's your goal? Write a synopsis from one paragraph of your entire story, leaving details and features of the character. Then take this item and reduce it to one sentence. For example, Dragon Ball can be a group of friends fighting strange enemies to protect the Earth. Does this mean that DB actually covers? No, but that sums up where this story will lead. In order to develop your story, you need to know who your characters are. Where did they come from? Do they have morals and values or do they not exist at all? Love interest? Best friend or sworn enemy? What makes them tick? Write a full profile as if you were telling someone else about your boyfriend or girl. Develop your strengths and weaknesses as they come in handy when you start to develop your storyline. At this point, don't think about layouts or problems. Just write your story. What is going on? Who's this happening to? Why did she leave or why did he come back? Will his powers ever return? Why did he lose them in the first place? Get all your questions answered on paper first. Then it's time... With a big picture in mind, think the first question. You will need to give some background to your story and you will want enough ongoing action to keep the reader intrigued for your next installment. Decide how much information you want to give in the first release. Have? Now you're ready for storyboards. Storyboard is a phrase that refers to a mock-up of a manga or comic book. Each panel transmits a certain amount of information and will also contain your artwork. Don't worry about illustrations right now (unless of course you can draw as well as write!). Just focus on the text. Who says what? What action scenes will you turn on? What information will they provide? Break your story into pieces that you can section into separate panels. It's time to take your story along with a work of art. Either find yourself a good anime artist or, if you're feeling adventurous, try your hand at drawing your own characters. There are some great books out there that teach you how to draw, as well as a few good sources on the internet. The upitimity of each character has different facial expressions and the dialogue that you have created in storyboards. Ready to deliver your pilot question to the masses? Try the TOKYOPOP Annual Rising Star Manga Contest or put your manga online by setting up your own website. Good luck! Tips: If you're having problems, start with some Fan Fiction. Characters are already created, all you have to do is play the game what if? to come up with Storyline. Take a look at some of your favorite anime shows and manga, and try to find out why they are your favorite. Is this an action? Characters? Characters? does it so cool? Don't rush with the masterpiece. Sometimes, great ideas can just come to you, but don't get discouraged if the development process takes longer than you imagined. Even in the era of silent cinema, when full orchestras would perform the score live as the film flickered overhead, we expected that our films would have sound. However, we don't have the same reading expectations. Why not? Why shouldn't a book, or even a comic book, have its own account? This is the idea of Otowa, a charming device that combines a mechanical organ with Japanese manga to create a delightfully analog multimedia experience. There is nothing high-tech in Otow. It is a standard hand-cranked mechanical organ, but instead of a pre-defined song, the music it plays can be programmed with strips of perforated paper. It's something between a music box and a piano player, except that instead of using musical rolls, you feed the manga through it. These music manga strips read from left to right, and as they breeze through the music box, the story is complete with score-turns. On some manga strips, there are pauses for panels when the dialogue takes place, only for the music to spark the backup back as the talk gives way to action. In other bands, the manga itself instructs you to crank the music box faster or slower to adjust the tempo of the music according to the action, so that the scene where the character works, for example, will be faster than the scene in which the character drinks a cup of tea. Otowa was created by the Japanese design group Mieru Record, a collection of eleven artists who are all inspired by the idea of merging music and manga in a fused form. With the support of Japanese newspapermen Tokyo Shiki, Otowa won the jury prize at the 17th annual Japanese Media Arts Festival. Although admittedly simple, Otowa is pretty charming. Imagine reading Speed Racer or Astro Boy with dynamic soundtracks. Unfortunately, however, there's no chance of buying one of these right now and dropping it into stocking your beloved Japanophile: it's just a prototype. You can read more about Mieru Record on the artists' official website.
